Dust mite droppings are considered a major allergen because of the large number of people sensitive to them, or 'specifically' allergic to their harmful content.

The droppings

have an active digestive enzyme that can cause cell death in the lungs by 'melting' the glue like substance that binds cells together. The cells' death in turn gives enzymes access to the body and blood stream. This invasion is how traces of the mite's major allergen have been found in the amniotic fluid surrounding unborn children.

Dust mites and asthma

This is a recurring difficulty in breathing caused by allergy to an external protein (such as from house dust mites).

Wheezing, coughing, or tightness of the chest are common symptoms. If a person is allergic to mites, then continued exposure to mite allergens will generally make the asthma symptoms worse.

The BBC's on-line Earth News suggested that house dust mites were one of the deadliest animals in the UK because of their propensity to instigate severe allergic reactions, such as asthma. They report around 20% of the UK population is allergic to the mite; 90% of the country's five million plus asthmatics report the mite as a trigger; and in 2008 alone, over twelve hundred people died from asthma.

To control dust mites their eggs must also be neutralised

Scientists took 4 mites and let them breed in the best conditions for four months, when they finally looked they had 1217 mites

Are you sleeping alone?

Almost all houses have dust mites - it does not mean you are dirty! You can control these microscopic pests and the effects of living with them.

Dust mites don't bite, the damage is done by breathing in their atomised droppings - this is particularly bad for children - check our website for more information.
