

IS YOUR WIRING OUTDATED?

-Old fuse boxes or outdated circuit breakers are potential fire hazards in any home so it pays to check them regularly. Remember that these are usually located in dusty, humid or mouldy environments and could be affected by insects or other pests. The bottom line is you should be careful when doing this yourself and at the first sign of any damage or disrepair you should immediately call an electrician.

-It is ironic that many electrical fires could have been prevented by regular maintenance checks. It is important to have your wiring checked every 2 or 3 years to make sure no damage has occurred in the intervening years. A professional electrician is the only person equipped to provide you with a thorough check and to give you the peace of mind you need.

-Some other tell-tale signs that you need professional help is when you find melted fuse boxes or when you see sparks when plugging in an appliance around the home. Overheating of appliances in this way can result in a fire so unplug it immediately and take it for repairs.

-Remember that every household electrical system is different and some houses will need more regular checks than others. The only way to find out is to get an electrician to tell you how often you should check your house wiring. In particular, older homes expose you to a greater chance of danger because most modern houses built during the last 10 years will have electrical systems installed which minimise problems. Nevertheless, you should never assume this is always the case and calling electrician at least once every 5 years.

-These days most households have a plethora of electrical appliances with new additions almost every month. When you consider HD television gear, sound systems, air-conditioners and dozens of plug-in chargers you need to - be even more vigilant.
